Long talk with M. about the office move. I notice I keep framing it as a cost question when the actual thing I'm avoiding is that I like working from home more than I'm willing to say out loud to the team.

The sync bug from yesterday turned out to be a clock skew issue, not a logic error. Two hours lost to something a single assert would have caught. Writing that down so the lesson sticks: when the data looks impossible, check the timestamps first.

Walked at lunch. Grey, 11°, the kind of day that doesn't ask anything of you. Thought about whether the thing with the office is really about the office at all, or about wanting fewer decisions in a week that already has too many.

What am I not seeing? Especially around the office question.

CLAUDE · SONNET

Across the five entries the office comes up three times, and each time it's paired with something else: a bad night, a bug that ate a morning, a week with "too many decisions". You never argue against the move on its own terms.

One reading: the office isn't the decision you're avoiding. It's the one decision you can still postpone, so it's absorbing the discomfort of the ones you can't. That would explain why "cost" never quite holds as a reason.

Worth checking against the September entries: did the same pattern show up around the hiring decision?

A line or two, if you want

Tired but fine. The sync bug is dead. Didn't open the laptop after dinner, which was the goal.
